Life on the Ranch

CORINTH PARKER was named after her grandmother in Colorado who was named Corinth after an ancient Greek city that history books described as being very beautiful. Grandmother Parker was no longer very beautiful, as she had been when she was a girl growing up in a wild mining town, but she was still every inch a "western" woman with a kind of boldness and a straightforward, steady look that cowhands on her ranch swore "would freeze a coyote in its tracks." Young Corinth hadn't seen Grandmother Parker since she was a small girl, and in those ten or twelve years her memory had fashioned an image of a petite old lady in black silk with yards of snow white hair wound in a large bun on the top of her head.

It was for this reason that Cory was shocked when she got off the train in Denver and looked into the suntanned, hardy face of a strapping woman dressed in a leather skirt, bright cotton blouse and jodhpur boots.

"Well, hiya, gal!" Grandmother Parker exclaimed with tremendous exuberance and clasped Cory to her with equal enthusiasm. "Why, I wouldn't have known you, you're such a young lady, except for that Parker look around the eyes. Yessireee!" she laughed with a whoop of delight, "You look just like that old polecat of a father of yours!"

"Y-you're Grandmother Parker? My Grandmother Parker?" Cory couldn't help asking, she was so certain that somebody had made a terrible mistake.

"Why, of course, child! What a question, for land sakes! You mean you don't recognize your own grandmother? Well, it's no wonder, what with all them eastern airs they teach young folks back there! You probably expected to see the Queen Mother. Well, now I'll tell you, child, we're plain and simple folks out here and no fancy do-dads, so if they've raised you to be a delicate, shrinkin' violet, you won't enjoy spendin' a whole year on a ranch with me and a bunch of handsome, young cowpokes."

"What did you say, Grandmother?" Cory asked, her eyes widening with interest.

"Uh-huh, you're a Parker woman, all right! I said . . . well, you heard what I said, you little rascal," Grandmother Parker replied with a wink. Then she put one finger to her lips and gave forth a whistle that sounded like the siren on a fire truck, waving one arm in the direction of a young man behind the wheel of a station wagon. The lanky, six-foot boy smiled as he ambled gracefully toward Corinth and her grandmother.

"Corinth, this here's Beetles, called such 'cause of them dern shaggy beetle brows," Grandmother Parker said with rough affection.

Beetles flushed slightly, but his bright blue eyes beneath a pair of heavy dark-blond eyebrows looked approvingly at the new addition to Sunset, Grandma's sprawling modern ranchhouse on 300 acres of grazing land.

"That isn't my real name, ma'm. It's Andy," he said and picked up Corinth's luggage, carrying all five bags as easily as one small overnighter. . .

"And my name's Cory," she said, returning his smile.

"O. K., ma'm, I mean, Miss Cory," Beetles stammered, then both laughed and walked toward the car, almost forgetting Grandma Parker was with them until she whistled again at some friend she saw several yards away and waved her big felt sombrero in greeting.

Grandma hopped into the driver's seat, pushed her jodhpur boot on the gas pedal and the car shot out of the railroad station like a bullet from a rifle. She drove about seventy miles an hour, squinting against the setting sun and keeping a steady eye on the road. After an hour and a half's drive, the station wagon zoomed around a sharp turn and made straight for the most breathtaking sight Cory had ever seen in all her life. Sunset lay before them, stretched like a magnificent giant, its great rooms extending one after the other in a white horizontal line across a flat expanse of barren earth. She had seen pictures of modern ranch houses in magazines at home, but the real thing was something she hadn't realized would be so exciting and beautiful.

"Oh! Oh, Grandma!" she exclaimed.

"You like old Sunset, do you, child? Well, you'll like it even better when you live in it awhile."

Beetles just looked at the spectacle quietly and a lump formed in his throat. It always did when they drove in on it that way or when he was rounding up the cattle and rode down the gentle slopes that stood to the sides and back of it.

Grandma had adopted Beetles when he was a baby, rearing him as she had done her own six children many years ago. He was eighteen now and ready to go to college the coming semester to learn, he told Grandma, "how to design houses like Sunset."

The first week at Sunset, Corinth learned how to handle a horse. She was given a sleek black mare named "Sagebrush", a saddle, blue jeans and boots and was told by Grandma to "ride 'er!" Of course, Grandma knew that Cory was frightened to death, but that Beetles would see that Sagebrush behaved like a lady until she became accustomed to a new rider.

The second week was spent in getting acquainted with the fifteen ranch hands at Sunset, most of them, as Grandmother Parker had said, handsome young men. But there was something about Beetles that Corinth couldn't quite describe that made all the other boys seem pale and uninteresting. At first she thought it was because he was so shy and blushed every time he helped her mount Sagebrush, or because he was so polite to her and Grandmother Parker, or because he had a rich, deep baritone voice and sang folk songs better than her favorite singer back East. And then she realized it wasn't any one of those things, but all of them . . . and all of them added up to a strong feeling about Beetles Parker.

Beetles apparently found something unusually attractive about Corinth, too, because he began acting strangely. Grandma noticed that he kept his boots carefully polished, asked if he might have a small increase in his allowance to buy, of all things, a suit, and even asked Grandma for the car to go into town to have a haircut. It was the haircut that finally convinced her that Beetles had gone a little daft until she watched him watch Corinth one day riding like a veteran down the slope with her black hair flying in the wind. He had the same expression in his eyes that he got when he looked at Sunset, and then Grandma knew.

Corinth and Beetles went to Denver on their first date and from then on the two spent most of their time together, liking especially to take long evening rides into the surrounding hills. Since it was a fairly well established after-dinner routine, Grandma didn't think it unusual that Corinth wasn't around the house one night until she saw Beetles chatting with a group of ranch hands outside their bunks. Suddenly she felt a cold chill, frantically grabbed her hat, and rushed out of the house toward him.

"Where's Corinth?" she asked with a tremor of panic in her voice.

"Gee, Grandma, I thought she was with you," Bettles replied and knew immediately what

Grandma was thinking. "I'll saddle the horses right away," he mumbled and ran as fast as his long legs would carry him to the stable, his heart beating like a triphammer.

As Grandma and Beetles made a double track of dust toward the purple hills, a single tear formed in each of Grandmother Parker's grey eyes and ran in two scribbly lines down her cheeks.

"I'll never forgive myself if something's happened to her," she said. "I just felt that one of these days Sagebrush would run wild again. You can't trust a wild horse, no matter how well you think you've got 'em under control. It's in their blood and they'll try to find their herd again, sure as shootin'."

"Don't blame yourself, Grandma. I've been around horses all my life and I would have sworn, too, that Sagebrush was broken. But I guess you're right. You might think for a long time that you've conquered a wild horse, but you never really do. Anyway, we'll find her. We've got to," Beetles said, and drew his brows together in a deep frown. He was worried and his mouth felt dry with fear.

They parted and divided the hills into half-circles, Grandma taking the north half, Beetles the south to search for Corinth. For two long, dreary hours they combed the land and met again at the point of their separation, each without having found a trace of the lost girl.

"What'll we do now?" Beetles sighed, trying to keep his voice from shaking.

She pressed her knee into her horse's side and swung him around down the incline, through a tortuous path of rock and underbrush. After several minutes of their winding journey, Beetles heard the faint sound of rushing water. He looked as the moon moved from behind a cloud and there, roaming about a slim silver waterfall, were twenty or more wild horses. They stomped the ground and uttered their strange, soft screams. To the side of the waterfall, Cory was perched on a rock with her chin cupped in her hands watching the animals.

"Beetles! Grandma!" she waved as she saw them riding toward her. "They're wonderful! Come look at them. Sagebrush has found his brothers and sisters."

Their fear was calmed to find Corinth safe and Grandma and Beetles smiled at each other.
